DAUGHERTY WHITE, of Clay.
REGISTER OF LAND OFFICE,
JOHN B. HERNDON, of Mason.

Instantly to the tnat before him.

The proposition he set forth to establish, we beg to repeat, was, that Mr. Clay, in supporting John Quilney Adams for the Presidency, and in accepting subsequently the Secretaryship of State under Mr. Adams, in 1824, nearly a quarter of a centrary before, had been guilty of a corrapt bargain with the New England pateiot and statesman. This was the charge. It is measurery that the reader should been it distinctly in mind if he would appreciate the first point in support of this charge was the fact that previous to the strangel of 1824 Mr. Clay and Mr. Adams had not been on the most instance or kindly terms. His implied argument was that Mr. Clay, in view of his personal relatiors with Mr. Adam, would not have given his support to the latter for the Prendency, if there had not been a currupt largain between them. This was the logical significance of the point. It was the impression Boyd designed to produce. He said on this hads:

The letter to which he silleded, assumed, either he produce of Kr. Adams as a candidate for Prendency of the United States—was unspopular by inspiration, that Mr. Adams—him the Wastern country, and particularly with the Wastern country. That letter also assumed that, between Mr. Adams as a candidate for Prendency of the United States—was unspopular to the latter of the Mr. Adams as a candidate for Prendency of the United States—was unspopular to the latter of the man and to their peable or the prendency of the United States—was unspopular to the prendency of the United States—was unspopular to the peable of the Western country, and particularly with the Wastern country. The letter should be subjected to the produce of the transition, that Mr. Clay, during the case of the prendency. The three first he could, but the did not wish the vote of Kentucky. The letter had been country of Beaut, and continued the produce of the transit the would point to a certain article written by a writer who signed himself "Wayne." He might not have time to read even an extract from that article; but it charged the wenerable gentleman with being disposed to burser the rights and privileges of the people for a mean of codish. Whether the articles would be desemed conclasive or not the would not undertake to may; but he would present it, and the Homen should judge for itself. That avidence would show, as he believed, that Mr. Clay had some agreet; in that problication, and the addiscod it as one fact which satisfied his mind that there were unfriendly relations between Mr. Clay had some agreet; in that problication, and the addiscod it as one fact which satisfied his mind that there were unfriendly relations between Mr. Clay had some agreet; in that problication, and the addiscod it as one fact which satisfied his mind that there were unfriendly relations between Mr. Clay had some agreet; in that problication, and the distinct, and a subject, and an apology to the people of his district, and gave an had received or district, and and received or district, and an apology to the people of his district, and gave an had received or district, and gave an historic, an his time was limited.

Mr. Boyd hoped the gentleman would be very Mr. Clay, and not for Mr. Adams. In was the desired to know who the write; who called himself "Wayne" was understood to be. Mr. Amos Kundall.

that day to show that they were generally telleved, and onch was the extensive preparation and the abuse levelled against Mr. Adams in the West during that period, and particularly in regard to the transactions at Gheen, that that geatlenum thought it proper and a duty to himself to come out with a book (which, in the West, in called his book on disheries), in which he talked about enteidized slander, pointing directly to Mr. Clay as a party to these alreaders.

and that, as against Mr. Adams, General Jackson was the decided choice of Kentucky. Here, again, the tack suggestion was that Mr. Clay, particularly in the face of the strong preference of Kentucky, would not have woted for Mr. Adams, toward whom in feelings were not cordial, evar General Jackson, for whom he cherished friendly feelings, if he hand't been induced to do it by a corrupt meleratarding with Mr. Adams. Boyd enforced this point as follows:

But while there was good evidence of an unfriend difference of the suppopularity of that states are also the facts in the history of this effair in the Presidential context of 1828, I have never entertained, and therefore could not have expressed, any opinion inconsistent with the sentiments here given; and ha who asserts the continued in the state of the suppopularity of the suppopularity of the suppopularity of the gentlement, and the Adams in the State of Kentucky at that cary.

With regard to the nupopularity of that gentlement, be did not know what better test to put the matter to, that would be more clear, than the popular work of the State in the Presidential election, and the action of its Legislature.
